Stuart W. Cook Award
For Graduate Student Research in Social-Personality Psychology

The Stuart W. Cook Award is given annually to an advanced student who has made impressive contributions to research in Social Psychology while at NYU.

It is named in honor of Stuart W. Cook (1913-1993) who was an early advocate of social psychological research on social issues. He made important contributions to the study of prejudice and social attitudes, and was a leader in building the Psychology Department at NYU, particularly the Doctoral Program in Social Psychology.

The following NYU graduates have been awarded the Stuart W. Cook Award. Their names are also listed in a plaque that hangs in the Social Psychology Area of the Psychology Building.
